A: NSCL stands for National Science Foundation Center for Language Engineering Here's the description from the organization's web site: NSCL is a research center of the National Science Foundation (NSF). NSCL is a Center of Excellence (COE) of the Institute of German Language and Linguistic Science (DLR). NSCL conducts research concerning all aspects of language acquisition. This includes the development of acquisition software, hardware design, and methodology. A program written in Germany's native language cannot be automatically translated to English. Instead you have to have a program that is written in English to handle the translation.

The free web site BabelFish is an example of this. BabelFish is a free web site that uses Google Translate to translate web pages and e-mails. If you want to learn how to program an application, visit the Why Learn Programming site. You would probably learn more from reading books that are written in the English language. You can use the search engine Google, to search for words and phrases in German and English.

The The Bluebirds (song) [German: Der blaue Vogel] is a popular Christmas carol in Germany, dating back to the 18th century, which appears in several forms. The first version, "Der blaue Vogel", was written and sung by Heinrich F. L. Melchior(1537–1602) in Nuremberg, Germany. It was published in 1585 as part of his Historisch-Antiquarische Volks-Geschichte (which was published in 1614) and became famous after 1629 when a pastor, Melchior von Hofmannsfeldt, wrote an a cappella version for his congregation, and the melody became a Christmas carol in German and French. The version we sing is often considered a "parody" of the original melodic material. It is essentially a trochaic melody, with a long falling note sung over the fourth beat, and it was written by Kasper Beyer around 1700.
